I am still working on the new design! There is much to do and to optimize.
The new representation of MGS should complete two tasks:

1. As simple as it can get (almost done)
2. Become a "personality":

This includes to give the user translucency of the background(-progress) of MGS. This is a process of giving back some integrity.

Especially when representing a well-crafted (or lets say clean) design, I think ( this is my personal feeling, correct me if I am wrong) most user could think that giving a free service does not sound legit. Thus they are somehow scared.

Long story short :) I just want to give a quick background about its creators. Just some info about you. Perhaps what you study, what your hobbies are etc. - you can be creative!
Of course (I am open-minded) if you wish to not do this because of your privacy I am completely ok with it!

Cheers!
Nelson

Hehe, I don't think integrity was the word you were looking for, but I definitely agree! Since MGS is essentially a portal at the moment (providing links as the main service), users probably don't have too much to fear from it, but I certainly find it nicer browsing when I feel a personal connection to the website's creators. I'll send some info shortly.

Thanks Sam,
Sorry for not finding the correct translation, I ment something like reliability, seriousness, respectability - hope you can imagine what I mean :D
Ok great to have another experience as I always find organizations which provide free services some kind of suspicious :D

No problem, I understood, just poking fun about the word choice :)

Here's a fun bio:

Sam consistently amazes readers by utilizing his academic background to interpret games in the context of ludological innovation. He also likes all those pretty pixels moving around on the screen. Ooh, shiny. Fun fact: Sam was convinced at an early age that he would either be a professional philosopher a professional face-player. Or both. Probably both.
